Migration and Inequality

July 8 to 12 | 2013

Migration and Inequality

Migration is a key challenge in contemporary societies. The magnitude of people who live and work abroad has never been as large as today, with migrants making crucial contributions to economic, social, cultural and political transformation in modern societies. This situation is a momentous challenge for the social sciences: The issues to be addressed include the causes, progress and consequences of migration; the relevance of (familial) networks as well as cultural, symbolic and economic capital for migrational processes; migrants' living conditions; and the manifold and partially conflictual relationships between natives and immigrants. Moreover, spatial structures and processes of delimitation are paramount to international migration and are to be explored in terms of divergent political frameworks. Attending to the subjects of migration and inequality, the Marie Jahoda Summer School of Sociology is pleased to invite dedicated PhD students to send in their applications. The work will focus on five core themes supervised by a high-ranking international faculty.

APPLICANTS

The Summer School is intended for PhD students whose doctoral projects take up its core themes. Contributions will be either theoretical or empirical. Applicants should have a background in sociology or closely related fields. The course is open to approx. 20-25 international PhD students.

FORMAT

The Summer School is organised as a combination of lectures, students' presentations and discussions. Students will be asked to submit their papers (15 pages) beforehand and present them during the course in order to receive extensive feedback from distinguished researchers and other participants. The language of instruction is English.

“International Migration after the Global Economic Crisis”

Prof. Stephen Castles, University of Sydney, University of Oxford

Prof. Stephen Castles: Research Professor of Sociology at the University of Sydney and a Research Associate of the International Migration Institute (IMI), University of Oxford. He is a sociologist and political economist, and works on international migration dynamics, global governance, migration and development, and regional migration trends in Africa, Asia and Europe. His current research project ‘Social Transformation and International Migration in the 21st Century’ is concerned with the way global forces interact with local factors to shape human mobility. It involves fieldwork in Australia, Turkey, South Korea and Mexico.
